

LAW WAH'S LITTLE PICNIC.

It Took in Central Park and Mott Street and Ended in the Tombs.

LAW WAH, a Chinese laundryman, of 161 Walton street, and Lizzie Feuerstein, the fifteen-year-old daughter of a washerwoman living on a floor above Law Wah's place, appeared in the Tombs Police Court this morning to explain their presence on Pell street yesterday afternoon.

Law Wah was charged with abducting the girl and both were held by Justice Diver for examination Friday afternoon.

Law Wah is as much "Milean" in appearance as a Chinaman can be while retaining his queue, and so far as dress is concerned, he might be taken for a Broadway dandy. He can talk fairly good English and is said to be Lizzie's mother to be a member of a Chinese Sunday-school, but Law would not tell what one. He looks about twenty-five years old, but it wouldn't be safe to bet on it.

His appearance, he claims, before an American Judge was when he was led up to the rail in front of Justice Diver's desk. Lizzie was introduced to the Justice at the same time.

She is a bashful young girl, almost full grown, and her face is older than her dress would indicate.

"How did you come to New York?" was the first question asked her.

"With a friend," she replied, diplomatically.

"What's his name?"

"Why, on, it's Law Wah."

"Did your mother tell you that you could come?"

"No, but grandma did."

"She is seventy-five years old and don't know," broke in Lizzie's mother.

"I have to have my clothes washed, I left Little at work and when I came back last night she was gone. Then about 9 o'clock I heard she was here."

She had been going with him to Central Park and grandpa said I could," added Lizzie. "I didn't do nothing wrong. After we went to the park Law took me to Chinatown and bought me a new dress. He told me not to look at any of the other Chinese, and I didn't. We wasn't doing nothing when we was arrested, was we, Law?"

"We," answered Law, with a wise shake of the head.

"Law uses me nice," continued Lizzie.

"And don't mean like what I mean, and don't mean like what I mean."

"Did Law pay your fare?" asked the Justice.

"Yes, he did," answered Law, with a wise shake of the head.

"Law uses me nice," continued Lizzie.

"And don't mean like what I mean, and don't mean like what I mean."

"Did Law pay your fare?" asked the Justice.

"Yes, he did," answered Law, with a wise shake of the head.

"Law uses me nice," continued Lizzie.

"And don't mean like what I mean, and don't mean like what I mean."

"Did Law pay your fare?" asked the Justice.

"Yes, he did," answered Law, with a wise shake of the head.

"Law uses me nice," continued Lizzie.

"And don't mean like what I mean, and don't mean like what I mean."
